USDA’s Prospective Plantings Report Reveals Cotton Acreage Increase

Friday, April 1, 2016

By Mary Jane Buerkle

Texas cotton growers are expected to plant about 5.3 million acres of upland cotton in 2016, up 10 percent from 2015 but still less than the 6.2 million acres planted in 2014, according to the United States Department of Agriculture’s Prospective Plantings Report released on Thursday.

Growers on the Texas High Plains usually plant about two-thirds of the state’s acreage, which places the estimate for PCG’s 41-county area at about 3.5 million acres, which is close to the long-term average.

Nationwide, the USDA says that upland cotton producers intend to plant 9.3 million acres, up 11 percent from 2015. Texas growers are expected to plant more than 56 percent of the nation’s cotton acreage in 2016.

The largest drops by percentage are expected to be in North Carolina and South Carolina. Those two states, along with California and Virginia, are the only states in the Cotton Belt that are not expected to see an increase in cotton acreage for 2016.

The USDA estimates are slightly higher than those in the National Cotton Council’s 35th Annual Early Season Planting Intentions Survey, which was released in early February. The NCC survey indicated that growers would plant 8.9 million acres of upland cotton nationwide, and just more than 5 million in Texas.

“These estimates are very much in line with what we were expecting, based on what we are hearing from our growers,” PCG Executive Vice President Steve Verett said. “We expect to see a slight increase in acreage on the Texas High Plains, particularly in our northern areas where we saw a significant decrease last year. Rainfall in April certainly would get the 2016 crop off to a good start.”

CCI Chairman Hancock Represents U.S. Cotton Industry at Bremen Conference

Friday, March 25, 2016 From Cotton Council International

Cotton Council International Chairman Dahlen Hancock and CCI Senior Advisor Allen A. Terhaar participated in the 33rd International Bremen Cotton Conference and related meetings representing the U.S. cotton industry in Bremen, Germany, from March 13 – 19. This conference provided a good venue for networking and discussing U.S. cotton issues with scientists, the trade and industry experts.

CCI Chairman Hancock, a cotton producer from the New Home, Texas area, gave a keynote address at the Bremen Cotton Conference on responsible cotton production and sustainability efforts on a U.S. cotton farm, as well as sustainability in the industry. His presentation left a strong positive impression about U.S. cotton industry efforts and achievements in environmental responsibility, and he fielded numerous questions following the session and throughout the conference.

Terhaar chaired a general session of the Bremen Cotton Conference on new technologies in seed breeding. The session provided reasons for optimism on the future of cottonseed technology, but also indicated likely resistance from European non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and possibly consumers, to many of those technologies.

Hancock and Terhaar also participated in an all-day forum on natural fibers put together by the Partnership for Sustainable Textiles of the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Internationale Zusammenarbeit (GIZ) of the German government. The session brought together cotton production experts from around the world to discuss standards for the effort that the German government started two years ago. The overarching objective of the Textile Partnership is to demonstrably improve social, economic and environmental conditions along the entire supply chain in the textile and apparel sector.
